COMMUNITY DRIVEN DEVELOPMENT & SDGS

Shri Vivek Trivedi, Social Development Officer, DAY-NULM, Municipal Corporation, Chandigarh shared that Community-Based or Community-Driven Development (CDD) is a recognized approach from many international institutions such as the World Bank which promotes inclusive development through empowering local communities. Prior to CDD, these communities comprised primarily of women, elderly and the youth were under represented. CDD gives “a great deal of responsibility and authority to allow villagers and ethnic minority groups to decide and manage their own development activities.” Solely focusing on the World Bank, its active CDD projects in the Asia-Pacific Region were worth $9.8 billion. The UNDP also recognizes the importance of communities and local sustainable development solutions through various funding programs and partnerships.

However, CDD does not come without criticism. The qualitative goals of the CDD are hard to measure and therefore the effectiveness of the related projects is unclear. Also, there is potential for "Elite Capture" which is when a small group within the community takes all the benefits of the project.

Nevertheless, the bottom-up idea itself has potential to benefit the previously excluded groups with a multi-faceted approach, including the individuals with disabilities, indigenous populations, women, youth and so many more to achieve collective rural and urban development.
